Luminoso is a one-of-a-kind puzzle game. The goal of each puzzle is to make all laser beams hit the receiver pieces of their respective color. All pieces can be moved, rotated, and turned into various shapes. The pieces can be rotated around a point, the center of the board, which can lead to very complex configurations. The piece types are the most unique and creative I have ever seen in any puzzle game. I chose the pieces and the engine was programmed by me. All pieces are designed by hand. In an effort to consolidate the vast wealth accumulated by all three of the Kingdoms, Emperor Wudi decided to initiate a war to cement his hold over China. The core of the campaign would be the war between Wu and the Wei Kingdom. Three Kingdoms' Western text only places Jin in this struggle as a minor player, so I've had to rearrange things a bit. What's new in ChessCraft:

The guests in the pale green tent wore Western clothes, even while managing the agendas of their respective ministries. Still, as the U.S. and Iraqi delegations did last week in Washington, they opted to debrief one another on the fires that now rage between their countries, the depths of hatred on the ancient turf of Mosul and the damage wrought on Iraq's civilian infrastructure by ISIS. Everyone came to demonstrate to their own and to others' satisfaction that they have not been frozen out of Iraq's future. At the meeting's impromptu head table, seated alongside the PMO, was Vice President Tarek Mehmud, a reminder of the degree to which both countries need and count on the other. On the most symbolic front, Hussain al-Shahristani, Iraq's new minister of electricity, painted an image of broad national consensus, which is more than can be said of the ministry itself at the moment. For weeks, Iraqis have watched electricity shut off in their neighborhoods, relays have been bombed and terrorists have plundered the electricity supply system. And that may be as early as the government can get to convincing the public that it is the official bad guy. The ministry's power plants stand idle because they lack oil; because the oil that is extracted is far more expensive, the ministry is unable to buy new supplies; and because Iraqi electricity is subject to greater pressures, actual power has not been consistent at best and the budget is out of control at worst. "The electricity situation is undoubtedly the most urgent in terms of facing up to the problem. The power situation requires attention," said Shahristani, a slight man who seldom smiles. "But Iraq has its own problems. We are in a phase of adjusting how we work, of doing our own business. Economies adjust slowly. This is a natural phenomenon." With the exception of the country's borders, which were "largely stable," the airports were on all out of service. "This is not just an optical illusion," he said. "We have relied more on air traffic control, which has been disrupted by events on the ground. Not because there is a problem with the airplanes." Under the current system, he was forced to split trains. He mourns the foibles of his ministry's tight-wire juggling act. But the responsibility for the current
