The effects of seven professional physical activities on performance of ambulatory medical patients. We tested the hypothesis that 7 standard professional physical activities (passive, sporty, aerobics, walking, muscle exercise, fast walking, and jogging) would have the same impact on physician-patient interaction, as would a single bout of physical activity. A total of 21 physicians and patients assessed 7 professional physical activities and a single bout of physical activity (passive) on a scale from 0 to 100. Fourteen physicians and 14 patients also assessed the pain during the physical activity on a scale from 0 to 100. Physicians and patients believed that the various activities in general had the same or similar effects on physician-patient interaction, although there were some differences. The activities that patients found most difficult to do were those described as 'sporty' and 'muscle exercise'. The activities that patients found most pleasant were 'passive' and 'aerobics', although there was a difference between the two groups. The most effective physical activities were also those that patients rated as being difficult to do. This was consistent with the findings of physicians. Physicians and patients found the effect of physical activity on physician-patient interaction, as expected, to be the same for the various activities ($p > 0.05$). However, no activity resulted in a significant improvement in any of the variables measured ($p > 0.05$). In addition, no activity produced any reduction in pain ($p > 0.05$). These results suggest that participation in physical activity is unlikely to have beneficial effects on physician-patient interaction. Therefore, we recommend that physicians continue to stress the importance of exercise, although they should be aware that the current level of physical activity practiced by the majority of the population is not sufficient to ensure health.
