Q: Where to put graphics and sound files? I would like to move some graphics files (.jpg,.gif,.mp3) and music files (wav, mp3) from my PC to my phone. There's a space on the SD card slot, where people have put images. I thought I'd put the files there. But I've noticed a tendency among some other apps on the market to put the files somewhere non-standard on the card. I don't know whether this is to make sure that your files don't get deleted when the card is in a TF card slot, if you have a huge collection. But it occurs to me that if the device is not the SD card reader's default place, then this may confuse the OS in some way. I worry that the OS might not notice that the file is there, and not be able to do with it what it normally would be able to. In that case, I'd rather put the files in the standard places. I'm on Windows 8. Are there any standard places to put images and music on an SD card? Or is it just up to the developer? When it's developer's choice, do they know what they're doing? A: I think there are two general "best-practice" locations for files: Shareable & searchable: This is something you should probably have done in any event anyway, so this is really about enforcing compatibility with the files you already

British Racing Journal Newly released figures show that while British racing has made impressive progress, there are still too many racing drivers who are not pursuing a career in sportscars. The figures, from the Centre for the Study of Motor Sport (CSMS) at the LSE, reveal that in 2010/11, there were 1437 racing drivers registered on the MSA's (Motor Sports Association) list of full-time drivers of motor racing competitions in Great Britain and Wales. Of these, 125 held grand prix licences and 11 awarded the Jim Clark Trophy. The remaining 1198 drivers could only race in less prestigious events or as amateur drivers. This highlights a big problem which needs to be addressed if we are to see a talent pipeline develop in our sport. A tradition is in place of granting drivers their grand prix licences at 16 years of age. This is mainly down to the fact that many children are keen to try sportscar racing even if they do not have the necessary physical maturity to compete at a professional level. From 2009/10, the age at which drivers are permitted to compete in the top series, changed to 17 years. Although this is a step in the right direction, it would still be an open question at what point a driver could receive a grand prix licence. A situation which will increase the age limit for those aspiring to be drivers is set to come into law next year. Following the initial introduction of the new legislation, the age limit will not apply to existing drivers. In 2012, it will be rolled out over a three-year period, with the age limit increased from 18 to 19 in 2014 and from 19 to 20 in 2015. Possessing a grand prix licence is the gold standard for a racing driver. To attain such a licence requires much more than just a few days of testing a motor vehicle at an event. It requires great training on track and in the gym. It demands a thorough knowledge of a vehicle, not
