TOKYO (Reuters) - In a face-saving landmark for Japan, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will seek to propose annual elections for a new assembly of lawmakers to replace one now dissolved and which was guaranteed an overdue vote for the first time in party history. Abe and his Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) are a big win for the party’s rank and file who, under the current system, have to survive and send a large number of new members to vote in each election. With no date set for the proposed changes, the LDP would need to pass a resolution explaining its reasoning as well as parliament’s opinion to the Diet - the lower house of parliament which has the final say in constitutional revision. A government minister said there was still some degree of uncertainty over the timing of elections for the current house as well as the election for the next upper house, but it could possibly go through with the change
