A method for the isolation of active glycosyltransferases from bovine brain using affinity chromatography on monoclonal antibodies to these enzymes is described. This technique, which avoids the use of detergents, greatly increases the specific activity of the enzymes. It provides a simple means for isolating from a crude preparation of glycoconjugates, lectin-reactive glycoproteins, with the ability to bind to glycosyltransferases. The enzyme was purified by this procedure and was found to be enriched in beta 1----4 N-acetylglucosaminyltransferase activity. The purified enzyme was used to compare the specificity of this transferase toward a series of oligosaccharides, among which a novel tetrasaccharide. The enzyme exhibits a high degree of specificity for beta 1----4 linkages and is entirely specific for N-acetylglucosamine. Of these glycosyltransferases, only beta 1----4 N-acetylglucosaminyltransferase exhibits transglycosylation activity. This method was applied to the isolation of a beta 1----4 N-acetylglucosaminyltransferase-reactive glycolipid form of the beta 1----4 N-acetylglucosaminyltransferase in bovine brain.// Copyright (c) Microsoft Corporation. ## What's new:

Sneiroball is an energy drink by Coca-Cola that was produced between 2010 and 2012, and sold in Canada, the United Kingdom, Ireland, and the Middle East. While no copycat products have been publicly revealed, some versions were given lower Vegetable Glycerine (EG) content. History Developed in 2007, the drink went international in 2010 with the Canadian launch by Coca-Cola Canada. "Aloe" and "Kick" (present in all versions) were added to the drink's flavour lineup in 2011. In 2011, Coca-Cola Canada rebranded it as a flu shots for children and in 2012 changed the packaging to a larger bottle. The name was also changed to the more upbeat Sneiroball. Manufacturing stopped in 2014. Ingredients The base ingredients are water, ethyl alcohol (ethylene glycol), sorbitol, maize starch, flavouring, colouring, and carbon dioxide gas. Alcohol content depends on the version, ranging from 9% to 10%. Satiety As a drink designed to end the meal cycle and promote the consumption of food, sniros are highly caloric, almost entirely reliant on carbohydrates, and much more so than is true for sports drinks (which also have significant energy sources but that are of different chemical composition than those in sniros). With calories calculated from the original package information, all aloe/kick versions consist of between 70-100% energy from carbohydrates, with some versions containing between 35-45% fructose and glucose. Calculations were made using the tables outlined in the en:wikipedia article on energy efficiency. Flavourings As is true for other citrus drinks, the element of citrus may be part of the drink's appeal. More than one sniros version contains a small amount of orange juice as an optional addition (though only Zest sniros version contains orange peel extract). However, citrus flavours have been the subject of some criticism due to the toxicity of citric acid in large quantities.

Carbonation Carbon dioxide has a range of properties, including the effect of causing gassyness. Carbon dioxide has been reported to depress satiety (see entry in substances affecting appetite, below). Hence, the drink may be said to be both hypertonic (i.e., it has more dissolved gas than water) and hypotonic. Carbon dioxide can make its way into the drink from a number of outlets: the partially-
