With the advent of ultra high-speed networks, particularly optical networks, customers are demanding to communicate faster in order to improve application performance and/or to accommodate increased traffic volumes. Network vendors, however, are reluctant to upgrade their equipment to support future bandwidth demand in order to maintain a competitive advantage with respect to service quality, pricing and customer base. Customers, therefore, are left to evaluate and select networks based on their own performance, service quality and/or market forces. It is desirable, however, for customers to select networks in an informed manner without spending unnecessary resources evaluating the networks.

Candida albicans in dentistry. Candida albicans is the most common fungal pathogen of the mouth. Both healthy and diseased individuals can harbour the organism, but the epidemiology of C. albicans varies widely between the two groups. In healthy individuals, C. albicans is usually present in low numbers and commensalism with the endogenous microflora is the norm. In this manner, the transient, harmless nature of the micro-organism is maintained and host-microbe homeostasis is preserved. In contrast, this is not the case in diseased individuals, where the disease burden of C. albicans is high and host defence mechanisms have been circumvented, resulting in overgrowth of the organism. Thus, diseased individuals have higher numbers of C. albicans in the oral cavity than healthy individuals. Individuals with a compromised immune system are at greater risk of developing disease as a result of C. albicans overgrowth, and it is this group that can be both at greatest risk and benefit from antimicrobial prophylaxis. Candida albicans is also increasingly implicated in oral mucosal diseases. A relationship between the incidence of oral lesions and the number of oral C. albicans was first established by McAloon, who reported a relationship between oral C. albicans carriage and the development of oral lichen planus and oral granulomas. A more recent study using molecular techniques confirmed a positive correlation between C. albicans and the development of oral lichen planus and suggested that specific C. albicans antigens may be involved in the pathogenesis of oral lichen plan
