What's new:

.1 :- "And the witch...who shall live...eternally...?" The Harkness system may be gone, but that doesn't mean it can't revive itself in another form—just like...video games. I've seen some commentary now on the quality of this episode. My opinion is that this episode is leaps and bounds better than the prior episodes. And with the worst possible thing that can happen, a losing streak in sight, this episode was a needed win. This episode picks up from the previous episode and sees Michael trying to find an answer to what is the "normal" that the movement has formed around, again specifically a question of the use of violence. During this time he is still dealing with his return to humanity and makes a symbolic cross of broken pieces of paper, much like he did in Doomed. Symbols will play a huge role. As we know it revolves around this symbology before and will play the same future. This episode will likely be one of my favorite this season. This episode sees the convicts hatch a plan about how to "safeguard" themselves on their journey and that includes closing their minds. This natural reaction could, and likely will lead to the convicts reverting back to their prehuman state if used too often. The stakes are high, while the convicts realize this the Nurse (Candy) will not hesitate to kill those who are making a threat to the four of them. She also admits she was hearing voices when she chose to "lose her mind" and yet this is the type of person she is advocating for the convicts to free themselves to. The angst of this episode was built to the highest of peaks and set to a very slow and important tempo (some people really hate this kind of episode). There are several different calling out to Michael (including Megan) which have some wonderful results. Game theme: Two Heads are Better Than One (S4E2) Two Heads are Better Than One Ladle Moment: After the first four syringe hits on Michael he has another hit that leaves a trail and will give the convicts "red eyes", as they call them later in the episode. Candy and the boys are going to be proactive in closing the eyes until they find a safe patch of land to stop their journey and any future ways the eyes are used on those lucky enough to be helped by them.
