Proponents of the 'Network Theory of Evolution' argue that bacterial cells first formed independently, and subsequently exchanged genetic information via physical contact. But this scenario cannot explain the origin of life itself. Here we show that, in contrast to'standard' theories, the 'Network Theory' can also explain life's origin on a planet already populated by replicating bacteria. In this scenario, 'virtual genes' are created in a physicochemical process that limits information transfer to the size of the cells themselves. This same process may also be responsible for the storage of genome information
