The effects of the dopamine receptor agonist apomorphine and dopamine-receptor blocking agent haloperidol on the penile erection induced by penile flaccidity in the rat were determined. For comparison, the effects of the adenylate cyclase activator forskolin and the non-selective beta-adrenoceptor antagonist propranolol were investigated. Apomorphine (0.5-5 mg/kg s.c.) induced penile erection in penile flaccidity and maximal penile erection. The threshold dose for apomorphine-induced penile erection was 2.5 mg/kg. Haloperidol (0.1-10 mg/kg s.c.) had a penile erection-inducing effect. The penile erection-inducing effects of 0.1, 0.5 and 1.0 mg/kg doses of haloperidol were significantly attenuated by pretreatment with 1 mg/kg of haloperidol. However, the inhibitory effects of haloperidol on the penile erection-inducing effects of 2.5 and 5.0 mg/kg doses of apomorphine were not significant. Forskolin (0.3-30 micrograms/kg i.v.) and propranolol (0.1-10 mg/kg s.c.) had no penile erection-inducing effects at doses which were effective for induction of penile erection by electrical stimulation. These results suggest that apomorphine induces penile erection by activation of central dopaminergic mechanisms. Furthermore, the central dopaminergic system does not seem to be involved in the penile erection induced by electrical stimulation.Business Homeowners and other lenders have found the ultimate way to escape on the housing market: Bootcamp.
