Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to a virtual local area network for allowing autonomous instant messaging between personal computers and/or other computer enabled devices and a computer. 2. Description of the Related Art Much of the recent development in digital communications has been directed to voice communications as opposed to other types of communications such as text or data communications. This is largely due to the increased popularity of cellular and wireless telephone technology. Cellular and wireless telephone technology generally allow a user to make telephone calls from almost any location. While these technologies have greatly enhanced the ability of a user to make telephone calls, they have not been well suited to other types of communications. This is due to the complex infrastructure needed to route telephone calls and other types of signals over the wireless links. In addition, communication delays in cellular and wireless telephone technology are often unacceptable for communicating other types of signals such as text and data. More recently, devices have been developed that allow for text communications to be transmitted from a server to one or more devices. For example, devices have been developed in which text messages are sent from a text message capable device to a cellular telephone device. These devices include devices that are specifically designed for use with a particular cellular telephone. Such devices are often cumbersome as they require the user to operate both the cellular telephone and the dedicated device. Other devices that are used with a cellular telephone are capable of receiving text messages but cannot transmit such messages. Such devices cannot typically be used without a cellular telephone because they do not have a display or other user interface such that the user can view text messages that are received. Recently, systems have been developed that allow a user to initiate a text messaging session with a text messaging capable computer capable device. However, these systems require the user to use a dedicated device to initiate the text messaging session. In addition, these systems are often cumbersome as the user is required to initiate
