The purpose of this study was to estimate the effect of 10-20 Hz electrical stimulation on the area changes during isometric contractions of the forearm and hand muscles. Pressure area changes over the palmar surface of the dominant hand were measured at the distal wrist and the proximal end of the third and fourth fingers during isometric contractions of the forearm muscles with the fist clenching the dynamometer handle, and with the palmar aspect of the palm in contact with the working surface of the handle. Ten healthy adult subjects provided the data for this study. The contact area of the hand on the handle increases systematically from the wrist to the proximal end of the fingers during 20% maximal voluntary contraction (MVC). Stimulation of the median nerve at 10-20 Hz during maximal isometric contractions caused an increase in the contact area of the hand on the handle in the proximal muscles, and in the distal muscles. No statistically significant differences were found in the pressure area changes between
