The new Google Assistant can now work with Bluetooth headphones, as well as a number of smart home gadgets, making it a good tool for controlling those high-tech gadgets that you get at your house. It can also now control your smart home devices, so you can ask for things like timers, alarms, and music all by just saying "OK Google." Read on for our full hands-on with the new Google Assistant. The first thing that Google Assistant on Home shows is a message letting you know about the new features. It turns blue to give you a visual clue that it's doing more than just telling you the weather. This isn't just a software update—this is more like a new feature. It's easy enough to go through your daily conversation with Google and create shortcuts for things like "OK Google, skip over the groceries" and "OK Google, let's have a private date night." But the true power of this update comes when you start talking to Google about various smart home systems. It's now aware of dozens of smart home devices, and can control them with a voice command.
