A defiant Senate bill that would bar insurers from denying coverage to people with pre-existing medical conditions, limit what insurers can charge older people and prevent insurance companies from denying care for sick people on the basis of their gender has cleared the Senate Judiciary Committee. In a 14-to-9 vote, the Senate panel approved the measure, heralding a landmark shift in federal health care policy and dramatically escalating a coming war between the Senate and President Obama over the legislation. The panel approved the bill despite three Democratic amendments that sought to weaken the measure. The Senate health bill, one of the most sweeping ever considered by Congress, would require Americans to have insurance, bar insurers from denying coverage for pre-existing medical conditions and limit what they could charge older people. The bill would keep the controversial “Cadillac” insurance plans — tax-free, high-cost plans that are often used by high-earning executives to pay for pricey illnesses and are anathema to conservatives — but would cap the tax subsidies they receive. It would bar insurers from denying coverage to children with pre-existing conditions, which has become a defining feature of the Democratic party’s health-care policy. “It is very unlikely that millions of Americans will lose their coverage,” said Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.
