The hemipteran sap-sucking insect Toxoptera citricida Wulp has been implicated in causing damage to citrus, grape, and other susceptible host species. The purpose of this study was to evaluate both the short-term and long-term effects of a selection of insecticides on a field population of this aphid in Berkeley County, SC. Adult aphids were exposed for 6 d to 7 different insecticides containing either 2, 4, 8, 16, 32, or 64% surface-active agent (SAA) and tested for mortality. Results indicated that SAA alone had a strong toxic effect and suggested that the loss of caleosin, a major cuticular lipid component, may be a critical factor in aphid tolerance to chlorpyrifos. In a subsequent experiment, pre-oviposition inhibition was assessed for 5 insecticides, 2 of which proved lethal to adult aphids (2% diazinon and chlorpyrifos). The long-term tolerance of two generations of aphids (F(0) and F(1)) to each of the insecticides was subsequently tested using a population decline bioassay. Several of the tested insecticides appeared to have a negative impact on aphid fitness. In order to further delineate the possible effects of current use of insecticides on T. citricida, a post-larvae bioassay was completed to evaluate the sub-lethal effects of these chemicals on aphid growth. Among the insecticides tested, only the organophosphate chlorpyrifos slowed aphid growth (compared to a control diet) and altered fecundity
