If you do a lot of color correction or adjustments, you'll find a number of new tools in Lightroom 5. The feature I most enjoyed "creating" in Photoshop is now a function called "Adjust Color." As I mentioned, this is a collection of tools that choose a color from a select palette. First, you choose a range of colors within a color range to use, and then you click on a point in the image to choose a color. Then use your mouse to draw a rectangle that indicates the area you wish to adjust. The Adjust Color tool will then apply that color to modify the entire selected area. You can then choose to use one of a number of "standard functions" to edit the picture further, for instance, convert color, fix warmth/coolness, adjust exposure, and so on. If you click on the view menu, you'll have the same tool you've always had to get to the Adjust Color window. Review images about as easily as you can in Lightroom 4. Fire up Photoshop, import your images... what? Don't have the images? Go back to Lightroom, import all 700+ images for the Shoot As You Import dialog. Ok, import those images... you didn't import anything yet? Pick the images you'd like to import (there's a link on the window bottom-left), close the dialog, repeat. You don't want to import the images you still haven't selected? Use the "Preserve Selection" button to switch back to Lightroom and move the slider to "No Importing" - or stay in Lightroom and move the slider all the way to the left, to tell Photoshop not to import anything.
